

Is it a Monarch or a Viceroy?

The sensitive and delightful sense of taste is a wonderful experience in a world of wonders.

The Monarch Butterfly is a beautiful creature, but has a disgusting taste. Because of its taste birds avoid it and find other food.

The Viceroy Butterfly has almost the same markings and color of a Monarch... but does not taste like a Monarch. The birds do not know the difference and miss a tasty meal.

The sense of taste can be explained scientifically, but who can describe the taste sensation? We do not explain...we marvel!

Which came first in the evolutionary process...tasty things, or the ability to taste?

The theory of evolution implies there had to be a need for taste before the ability to taste evolved. If this is not true, the whole process has to be questioned.

If the first-creature or millionthcreature had no need for the sense of taste, why and when did this creature develop a tongue with millions of sensitive taste buds?

What are the chances of all the tasters and tasted things developing spontaneously and independently...at just the right time to match the need?

The only explanation in evolution is that it just developed over a long period of time because of need.

Creation is another story. The delightful sense of taste was the work of an intelligent, caring creator interested in providing remarkable things for his creation.

Which explanation is reasonable and delightful?

